Amateur Art in America

The Town and Country Art Exhibitions have been devoted exclusively to nonprofessional art in the State of Illinois for 25 years. But art of that kind, here and elsewhere, has a much longer history than the records of Town and Country can possibly show. The American Indian probably produced our first amateur art, and since then, it has been labeled with a variety of terms largely intended to describe its style. Among other things, it has been called primitive, provincial, pioneer, natural and naive, but such terms are not completely satisfactory. They do indicate, however, that amateur art is not a product of the academic or fine arts tradition. Instead, it is an outgrowth of the crafts: it tends to be simple and unpretentious rather than sophisticated; and it has its origin in rural areas more often than in urban cosmopolitan centers.

Little or no attention was given to amateur art in America until 1924 when the first exhibition of such work was assembled by professional artists and opened to the public. Clearly the professionals recognized high artistic merit in the work of their nonprofessional predecessors, and they called attention to that quality with their exhibition which they installed at the Whitney Social Club in New York City. At that time, the Club was primarily a center for artists, but it subsequently became the prestigious Whitney Museum of American Art.

It is not the least bit surprising that professional artists were among the first to recognize the aesthetic merit of folk art, because practicing artists are highly sensitive people who are always alert to quality in visual configurations. They use the work of others as a source of ideas and excitement, and many prominent artists have been influenced by amateurs. The sculpture of Elie Nadelman, for example, show an indebtedness to folk art, and so does the work of Roger Brown, Grant Wood, Doris Lee and many others. Sometimes the influence is conscious and sometimes it is not, but the point is that amateur art is a superb visual resource, and it should not be considered less important than professional art. Folk art may not reveal a masterly technique or it may not produce subtleties of composition, but it frequently shows a high degree of knowledge, care and sensitivity with regard to subject matter. It also indicates a delightful lack of influence from current artistic fads, and it often reveals superb craftsmanship and a surprising degree of originality in both idea and design. In addition, amateur art tends to deal with the brighter side of life. Consequently, it has an uplifting effect upon the observer.

Another thing to be said in favor of amateur art is that it tells us a lot about life. When academics of the future want to know what it was like to live through the first 200 years of our history, they may do as they have in the past: they may turn to the work of professional artists for some of their information. But professionals may be less likely than amateurs to depict life as it actually occurred—especially during the last 200 years. This is because the emphasis in professional art has shifted significantly since the 18th century. It has turned away from the imitation of nature toward expressionism, surrealism, cubism and other attempts to inject more of the artist into his work.

Unfortunately, amateur art has not always been plentiful enough to provide a large quantity of information about life. Since the 1920s, authorities have found that folk art went through a surge of popularity after the signing of the Declaration of Independence in 1776. This wave of enthusiasm and productivity continued for 100 years, and it was especially strong along the Eastern Seaboard where it reflected the spirit of the new American democracy. By 1876, however, the activity of amateur artists began to decline and did not reverse its direction until after the Second World War. This means that for 70 years we generated only a small amount of amateur art that can be used by future generations as a source of historical information.

Perhaps it is significant that the period between 1776 and 1876 has been called the era of the common man, an era when ordinary people used the advantages of freedom to make a better life for themselves and to build a great nation. Most of the amateur artists of that period were craftsmen who earned their way as carpenters, shipwrights, stonecutters, blacksmiths, housewives and farmers. Some had studied briefly with professional artists, but most were self-taught. Like the individuals who purchased their work, the artists were obviously ordinary people. They were not members of the intelligensia, and they certainly were not examples of the leisure class. They were neither rich nor poor, neither ignorant nor insensitive. In short, the folk artists and the people who acquired their work were part of the backbone of America. Their existence was difficult, and they struggled mightily to succeed. They produced art in an effort to brighten their homes and lift their spirits.

In 1980, it appears that we may be going through another difficult period in our struggle to maintain a free and democratic society. It is also a period of enormous growth in amateur art. Perhaps our apparent need for personal strength and spiritual regeneration is connected to the increase in artistic activity. If so, let us hope that the making of art can do as much to brighten the lives of men and women in our own day as it did in the era of the common man.
